

5 Alternatives

1. A modern art poster/various graffiti design.
2. An educational chart to teach children about various objects.
3. A subsection of a game where you flip different grids and have two same patterns match.
4. A bulletin for students just moving into a dorm and the symbols guiding them about the essentials.
5. A medical info sheet from a doctor advising things to do to stay healthy: drink plenty of water, use a Zen bowl to help with meditation, eat on time, wear filtering glasses when staring at screens, play games to keep your mind active, and travel to different places.

Of the 5 alternatives, I choose to go with the second option since I could think of the most possibilities for it:

1. An icon hunt where you are supposed to search for the design placed all over the surroundings.
2. Flashcards in the shape of the icons with an interesting fact about each object
3. A coloring book featuring these icons.
4. A historical timeline chart detailing when each object was founded/created.
5. An educational video that make use of each of these elements in some way to narrate a storys

I compiled some templates I could find online into a coloring book. I wasn't sure how water should be colored so I left it out. The interesting thing for me would be to see if a child would also color the circular grids of the Connect Four board.

